Special Needs Committee presents

Measuring Student Progress in COVID Times

February 10, 2021
7:30PM

Children with disabilities are entitled to a free and appropriate public education during hybrid or remote learning. Decisions regarding special education programming continue to be driven by data, and the importance of collecting, maintaining and analyzing data remains critical during the pandemic. Parents should understand how to monitor and document the delivery of services and student engagement, and their student's progress – or lack of progress – through remote learning, and provide the needed data back to the school district. Amy Halpert, Esq. will share what parents should be considering, and what they can do.

Amy E. Halpert, Esq. is Of Counsel to the law offices of Littman Krooks LLP. Amy uniquely approaches the special education process from several perspectives. In addition to being a special education attorney, Amy is a New York certified special and elementary education teacher, with advanced certification in the Orton-Gillingham approach to reading instruction. She has taught students with diverse backgrounds and special needs. Amy combines her extensive legal background with the skills of a special education teacher, and the insights and compassion of being a parent of a child with a disability, to advocate on behalf of children and families. She works to ensure that each child with special needs receives services to which she/he is entitled and that parents are empowered with knowledge as they navigate the special education process.
